ed men were neither bound nor blindfolded. The Emperor, in an easy and graceful manner, made a regal bow to the multitude, and with a light step, led the way to the fatal spot. The Emperor, like the other prisoners, was attired in a plain manner. He addressed the crowd in a clear voice and manner, which partook not of bra-vado. He stated that when first waited upon at home by a deputa-tion of Mexicans, who came with credentials offering him the throno of Mexico, he refused. Subsequent ly the proposition was renewed. He replied that, if convinced that a majority thought it to their interest to place him at the head of the Government, he might consent. Another deputation brought him additional testimony, and upon ad-vice of the powers of Europe he had accepted the call. Said the Emperor: "I deny that the court which tried me had the power to do so.
